CROSS-REFERENCE GUIDE

(© 1978, Motorola Inc., all rights reserved)

This guide has been prepared by the Motorola HEP technical staff to provide a cross-reference for the Hobbyist, Experimenter, and Professional service technician. The information contained herein is based on an analysis of the published specifications of each device listed. This analysis was then compared to HEP specifications and the HEP device that best met or exceeded the important mechanical and electrical characteristics of the original was selected as the replacement. Every care has been taken to meet or exceed published parameters, but because of industry-wide differences in quality control, manufacturing, and testing process, which result in size and characteristic variations, and because some of the Motorola HEP devices are capable of higher performance than the original, Motorola Semiconductor Products, Inc. cannot guarantee that the listed items will provide an exact replacement in every instance and/or application.

Motorola HEP takes great pride in offering the most complete line of semiconductor devices appealing to the hobbyist-experimenter and replacement markets. All of the HEP devices feature complete published specifications, which can be found in the HEP Semiconductor Data Book.

IMPORTANT TIPS
On Using Semiconductors

Each Motorola HEP device will give excellent performance when operated within its published specifications, however, due to the very nature of the term "replacement" there are certain aspects that require consideration when making substitutions. In the greatest majority of cases it will be found that direct replacement can be made, requiring no circuit or mechanical changes. Occasionally the "stubborn" circuit will appear, where other components have changed value, or the original design was extremely critical. With these thoughts in mind, the following application tips are presented:

> NOTE: Many device numbers will be followed by a color notation (black, red, brown, etc.). This notation references either a color dot or the color of the ink used on the device.

Low-power Transistors – Lead configuration may differ; check original and replacement devices to be sure that collector, emitter, and base lead connections are correct. In most cases, fourth lead (shield) can be cut off and eliminated. Current and voltages must be checked, being certain not to exceed device ratings. Occasionally resistance values will have to be changed in order to achieve correct biasing. Tuned circuits may require realignment.

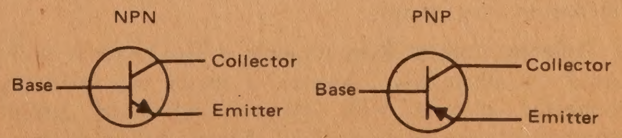
High-power Transistors – Make certain that voltage and current ratings are not exceeded. Adjust bias resistance to obtain optimum performance (many circuits use a small potentiometer for this purpose). Check all circuit components (resistors, coils, etc.) that might have been damaged if the original transistor was shorted. In most auto radio output stages, check emitter resistor (replacement transistor will be permanently damaged if this resistor is defective).

In order to assure maximum power dissipation, adequate heat-sinking must be provided. Also, contact surfaces should be coated with high-quality silicone grease. (Refer to HEP accessory list for each of these items.)

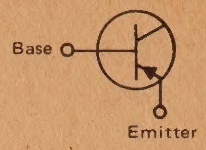
> CAUTION: When replacing high power horizontal and vertical output transistors make certain that preceding driver stages are functioning properly. Malfunction of these driver stages (as well as output stage circuitry) is often cause for failure of output devices, and replacements can be destroyed if this condition exists.

General Transistor Replacement Considerations – Frequently special-numbered transistors, that are not listed in any cross-reference guide, will be encountered. In most cases, a suitable replacement can be determined by following a few simple procedures.

1. NPN or PNP – Schematic symbol will indicate device polarity (note symbols below). Arrow always points away from base and collector when device is NPN, and arrow always points toward base and collector when device is PNP.



If schematic symbol is not available, polarity can be determined in following manner: With circuit energized, connect negative lead of voltmeter to emitter and measure voltage to base. If voltage reading is Positive, transistor is NPN; if voltage reading is Negative, transistor is PNP.



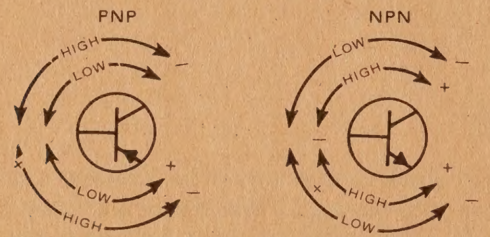
CAUTION:

Before using any ohmeter to check semiconductor devices the ohmeter should be checked to determine that:

1. No more than 1½ to 3 volts is available at the test probes on any ohms range.
2. The current available to be sourced by the test probes be limited to a few milliamperes on any ohm range.

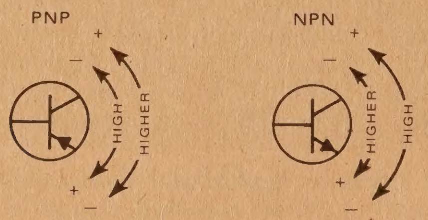
Failure to observe these two precautions could result in serious damage to the semiconductor device under test.

Polarity can also be determined in following manner using an ohmeter. Note: For this test, + and – of ohmeter probes must be known and connected as indicated in following illustrations.



2. Germanium or Silicon – Measure voltage from emitter to base. If voltage is approximately 0.25 volt, transistor is germanium. If voltage is approximately 0.6 volt, transistor is silicon.

Also, an ohmeter can be used for this test in following manner:



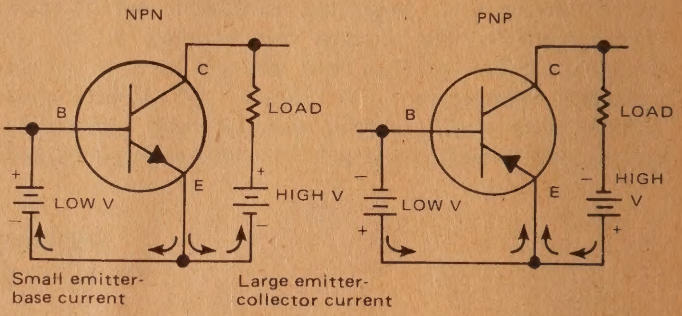
Germanium – will give meter reading
Silicon – will be very high (several megohms) to infinity.

3. Operating Voltage Considerations – Voltages from collector to base, collector to emitter, and emitter to base should be noted from either schematic or by actual measurement with voltmeter. Device selected for replacement should have voltage ratings of at least three to four times actual operating voltages for each of three categories. This type of safety factor is necessary to protect against voltage spikes, transients, and surges that are inherent in most circuits.

4. Collector Current Requirements – This factor is rarely noted on schematics, however, a meter can be easily connected in series with collector and actual current requirements can be determined. Again, a safety factor of at least three to four times measured current should be used. This measurement must be made during maximum-power conditions.

5. Gain Considerations – Due to complex scope of this subject only one gain parameter will be considered. This parameter is common-emitter small-signal dc current gain, referred to as h_{FE}, beta, or β. From standpoint of common applications, following general rules should be used as guideline. High gain devices (h_{FE} from 300 up) will find usage in preamps, RF stages, and converters. Medium gain devices (h_{FE} from 100 to 300) will find usage in RF and IF stages, oscillators, mixers, drivers, etc. Low gain devices (h_{FE} up to 100) will find usage in output stages, AGC, drivers, video amplifiers, etc.

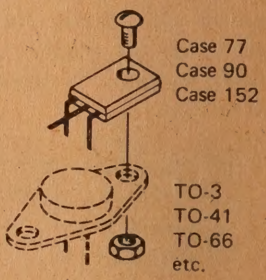
6. Transistor Biasing – Occasionally bias resistor(s) may have to be changed in order to achieve proper circuit operation. Following two diagrams are intended to show typical PNP and NPN circuit current flow and biasing voltages:



(Note that only difference is reversed battery polarity and opposite direction current flow)

Different Case Styles – Frequently there is quite a difference between case style of original part and recommended replacement. However, in most instances, this problem can be solved in following manner:

TO-5, TO-39, and similar case styles can be easily replaced with HEP devices that use case 152 by merely reforming leads to correct pattern. TO-3, TO-41, TO-66, and similar case styles can be easily replaced with HEP devices that use case 77, case 90, or case 152 by reforming leads and using only one of original mounting holes for attachment. Since collector of each of these devices is connected to metal tab, electrical isolation must conform to original device. Silicone grease should always be used with power devices to promote heat dissipation.



Silicon Rectifiers – Make certain that polarity is correct and that voltage and current ratings of replacement device(s) are not exceeded. Additional current can be handled by using two diodes in parallel, and additional peak inverse voltage can be obtained by connecting diodes in series. For replacement devices, make certain that PIV and I_C are at least 3 to 4 times normal circuit operating conditions.

Rectifier and diode polarity can easily be determined by using an ohmeter. Note: for this test, + and – of ohmeter probes must be known and connected as indicated in following illustrations.

Replacing Selenium, Metal-Oxide, or Vacuum Tube Rectifiers – Silicon rectifiers are much more efficient than other types of power rectifiers and do not become weaker with continued usage. In other words they are either good or they are bad. Due to increased efficiency, however, it is recommended that a 10 watt resistor be placed in series with B+ line to limit output voltage to required level. Resistance value may be determined experimentally or from equation R = E/I where E is dc voltage to be dropped and I is total dc current through circuit.

Zener Diodes – Optimum zener operation will result when specified I_{ZT} is maintained during normal circuit conditions. Zener diodes may be connected in series to increase zener voltage (6.2, 9.1, and 12.0 volt diodes in series would result in 25.3 final zener voltage, plus or minus device tolerances). Zener diode polarity can be determined in same manner as Silicon Rectifiers (above).

Silicon Dual Diodes – Excellent performance and customer satisfaction can be obtained by replacing weak or defective selenium or diode vacuum tubes with silicon devices. Leads may be formed to proper shape and plugged directly into original tube socket holes. (Leads may be bent and twisted to assure good electrical contact, soldering these in place is best procedure.)

Thyristors (SCR's) and Triacs – Most important characteristics, from replacement standpoint, would include Peak Reverse Voltage (V_{RM}), Forward Current (I_f), and Gate Trigger Current (sensitivity) (I_{GT}). V_{RM} and I_f must exceed normal operating conditions. If replacement device does not trigger under normal conditions it is possible that I_{GT} (sensitivity) is to high. If replacement device triggers prematurely it is possible that I_{GT} is to low.

Polarity, or terminal identification, of a Thyristor or Triac can be determined by an ohmeter as follows: Note: for this test, + and – of ohmeter probes must be known and connected as indicated:

Nomenclature
SCR = Silicon Controlled Rectifier
A = Anode
C = Cathode
G = Gate

Nomenclature
MT1 = Main Terminal 1 (formerly referred to as Anode 1)
MT2 = Main Terminal 2 (formerly referred to as Anode 2)
G = Gate

Integrated Circuits – An integrated circuit which has failed will very often show little or no change in the D.C. voltages measured at the pins. For this reason the voltage and/or resistance methods of troubleshooting are usually of little value.

There are, however, two other methods to troubleshoot an I/C suspected of failure which are reliable. These are: 1) signal tracing method, and 2) substitution method. The signal tracing method requires a knowledge of the internal I/C circuit function. When using the substitution method (substituting a known good device for the suspected bad one) all voltages applied to the I/C should be determined to be within safe limits BEFORE the known good device is installed in the circuit.
